OVERVIEW

President Joseph Biden has indicated an American foreign policy that is predicated on core values like democracy and human rights, as well as commitment to global institutions and multilateralism. Will this return to more traditional paradigms of American engagement result in more opportunities or challenges in different parts of the world? What are the likely impacts of America's foreign policy to its longstanding transatlantic relationships, and engagement in the Middle East? How does a Biden administration plan to reengage and revitalise with multilateral institutions, to manage a gamut of global challenges?
